THE MEDITERRANEAN

James Doyle

If I push the mule any harder, it will turn back on itself, then on me.

I’ll be stranded at the highest point of this island’s shoreline. The sides of my luggage begin to seep moss, the rash on my bare feet sneaks a moment of intimacy with the ferns, a tongue-tied breeze recycles the same Homeric lines over and over. Not a bad place to settle down. From this height, perhaps I could tempt the gods little by little back into the human after all these centuries. Such delusions of grandeur are a specialty of the Mediterranean. Why shouldn’t Neptune rise in its blue robes again, or its green rays sort through the drowned for new heroes? The mule tugs at me. Now he is impatient, wants to start down. I have to agree. One deserted hilltop, neither tall enough nor important enough to have a name, and I want to construct a homemade Parthenon out of stray rocks and even strayer brain cells. What else, looking out on the sea that centered the known world, on Odysseus windsurfing off Calypso’s isle?
